ONCE

后觉

I see them from a later time,

facing the wind,

talking about tomorrow.

I see them from a later time,

facing the wind,

talking about tomorrow.

The mountains have not yet drawn together,

carrying an unnamed direction,

the river,

flows

through each person.

The world that has already happened

stretches

unbroken

and

me between them.

They

can

no longer
see

me.

The moon

rises.

The tide knows nothing of it.

Sea

passes over

sea,

letting night walk toward the shore.

The rocks are silent,

islands surface from darkness.

Waves from farther out are coming.

It gathers, it rises, it overturns, it spirals.

The night sky tilts slowly toward the sea,

stars rise and fall with the waves.

Shimmer

is the moon's migration through the sea.
